Or maybe, you want something to build a school bus or a cabin on. Whatever the case, however, nothing is stopping the automaker from growing its profitable line of compact trucks and utility vehicles. That, at least, is what the company is projecting ahead for 2018. General Motors had planned to expand production of the GMC Sierra by a third in 2017, so it could deliver a full 5% of the company's annual global truck output. But going back on word given at the 2017 North American International Auto Show, GM said it would actually boost production of the Sierra to a more manageable total of 200 per year. The automaker also gave a nod to the customer's request for a product with better fuel economy. With that recognition, GM presented a current Silverado 1500 that actually gets 15% better mileage. The tweak reduces the vehicle's rolling resistance by five percent, trimming the vehicle's fuel economy from an 18 city/26 highway rating to 17/25 mpg. "Sierra is the perfect product that is suitable for a wide variety of different markets," said Steve Kiefer, group vice president, Global Product Development. "We're listening, and we are excited to deliver a truck that is very good for fuel economy and gives customers a new dimension." GM reported 11.5% total sales growth to $11.1 billion in 2017, but the $370 million spent on the three new trucks was actually part of the overall company's performance. Analysts expect the new generation of pickups to help the company. In fact, GM could be looking at a slight gain in overall 2018 earnings, which would be the first time in the modern company's history. About the Author Brandon Burgess is a freelance writer.
